Dobbs Auditorium provided the setting for one of the most dynamic presentations of Shakespeare's Othello ever witnessed. The towering figure in this most tragic of tragedies was the dashing Sir Malcolm Shackelford. Athletic in form, Sir Malcolm perhaps would have appeared more to character with a basketball in his hand instead of a cushion. His co-star, the petite Jennie Lee Epps, portrayed Desdemona. The real shockeroo in this poignant drama was a mad embrace that could not wait between Sir Malcolm and Miss Epps.

Margaret Cubine as Emilia and the honest Jarrell Hethcox as Iago played an absolutely charming game of drop the handkerchief.

The orchestra, under the supervision of Carleton S. Guptill, was unique in sound to say the least. Outstanding in performance was Kathryn Cline who tickled the strings of the lyre in such a manner that is giggled in superb ecstasy. Ann Clark did an excellent job on the Pauken, whatever that is. The chorus burst forth with music that could be compared only with that of the spheres. Mary Kay Ferrell's voice was fortunately not drowned out.

Other highlights of the program were songs by Ozzie Lanier and several selections by a quartet consisting of John Shibley, Carleton Guptill, Albert Stoutamire, and again, Ozzie Lanier. Mr. Lanier's performance was enough to make any girl's socks roll up and down. Following his selections, he was offered a contract to appear on the Dick Clark Show. Concluding the evening, the quartet, better known as the Kingston Trio plus one, sang "Good Night Ladies" in their unusual zesty tone.

Honorable mention goes to Margaret Talbott, Martha Sue Wood, and Al Thomas for carrying out the duty of commercials. Zachary Taylor supplied the poetry as master of ceremonies.

Takes to Heart: Mardi Gras and the Green Scene

The first stop on the parade was not the usual street corner, but rather a grandstand set up in the center of town. The crowd was eagerly waiting for the signal to start the procession.

As the bands played their favorites, the floats began to move. The theme of the day was all about nature and conservation, with various groups and organizations showcasing their efforts to protect the environment.

One group, the local chapter of the Sierra Club, displayed a float decorated with a large tree and a variety of wildlife. The float drew cheers from the crowd, who appreciated the message of the importance of protecting the natural world.

Another highlight was the parade of eco-friendly vehicles, driven by families who had modified their cars to run on alternative fuels. The vehicles were painted in bright colors and had signs on the sides expressing their commitment to reducing carbon emissions.

The day ended with a massive firework display, set off by the city's most famous muralist. The fireworks illuminated the night sky, creating a magnificent spectacle that left the crowd in awe.

The parade was a resounding success, with thousands of people coming together to enjoy a day of fun and celebration while raising awareness about the importance of environmental conservation.

Next Year's parade is set to be even bigger, with plans for a more diverse range of groups and activities. The community is already excited to see what the future holds for this beloved tradition.

If you missed the parade, don't worry! There will be more opportunities to get involved and show your support for the environment. Stay tuned for more updates on the community's efforts to create a sustainable future.
